His brother, Francisco Gallasso, was found on that corner to-day, and to a reporter, who represented himself as an employer after men he toid how he and his brother conducted their business. He first stated that he could not do any business until his brother returned, and then he said that the only place which they supply with laborers is the South Carolina mines. He said they got better pay for that than supplying other contractors, and he didn't think his brother would secure for the reporter the men he wanted.

Gallasso was then told of the way his fellow-countrymen were treated in "boss" was in his private office.

He was intelligent and well-dressed, and spoke good English.

When asked about the employment agency and South Carolina laborers, he said he had nothing to do with that business, which was conducted in his saloon by Anfradoma, of 159 Bleecker street. "He supplied twenty-two of the last batch of men sent South," said Convorens. "Antonio Gallasso took charge of them, and paid their railroad fare, which was $5.25 a man. I don't know what Gallasso and Anfrandoma get for hirng the men."

Consoreno denied that he had anything to do, with the society that met upstairs, but others who live in the same house said he rented the rooms and invited immigrants there to become acquainted with ineir countrymen. Several of the tenants of the house also declared that Conzoreno was hiring men for the South Carolina mines, and that he tells the men he employs that the work is easy and the wages high.

Anfradoma could not be found at 159 Bleecker street. None of the tenants knew him.
